CITIES AND TOWNS OF KANSAS

Mr. Gleed quotes Bishop Hunt from the New York INDEPENDENT:

The Bishop writes:

"In a half hour I was standing in that wonder of depots - the Union - in Kansas City. This same city is the key to our whole territory. Think of its growth. A citizen told me that when his Eastern eyes first saw the place, fourteen years ago, there was only one railroad track there, which soon lost itself as it trailed its solitary length up along the Kansas or Kaw river. Now twelve great railroads centre there. There are given times when most of the trains leave, and unless you wish to take one of them, you will do well to stand and look on. It seems as if the whole world has its carpet-bag in hand and is going to the next place. The tracts are not shut in by a great building, covered over with a glass roof; but are in the open air, the raised platforms along them being protected by light and delicate iron roofing, supported by graceful pillars. You thus have all the advantage of protection from the weather and perfect light and ventilation.

"The new census puts Kansas City up to some 60,000. It is a marvel of growth. The most of the residences are on the bluffs, where are also the best hotels and the finest retail stores, and where, until recently, the heaviest business was conducted. But the broad flat delta, formed by the junction of the Kansas river with the Missouri, is destined to be the business part of the whole city. The bluff will be a place of churches, residences and stores, while the great manufactories will be down in 'The Bottom'. The largest beef and pork packing houses in the West, I have been told in the world, are already in this level part of Kansas City. The Fowler Brothers are just completing their's. Across the Kansas river lies Wyandotte, spread out over the flats, and building up so rapidly that, like Kansas City, you have to give your orders for bricks nine months ahead before you can begin to build your house. There is no break in either population or business during the whole hour and a half walk from the outer rim of Wyandotte, across the Kansas river, along the Kansas City bottom, over the innumerable railway tracks, and up the steep bluff, where the neat homes of Kansas City, the majestic, stand and throw their evening shadows across the broad and islanded Missouri.

"My destination in Kansas was Lawrence, about forty miles beyond Kansas City, and up the southern bank of the Kansas river. One grows a little meditative as he takes his seat in the cars. The past begins to come in upon him, and he goes back to the days when the first battle of the republic since 1812 was fought on Kansas soil. When the treaty was signed in Paris, on the 30th of April, 1803, which gave us the Louisiana purchase, of which Kansas was a part, no eye could foresee the relation which this unknown State should occupy toward our national life. 'John Brown's soul' had just begun to march, for he was only wearing cotton pinafores, and lacked a month of being three years old. Some thirty miles away there once stood the old house of Osawatomie, which his own hands built, after he had snuffed, in the East, the morning air of the coming crisis, and had come to the heart of the hastening cyclone. Whether Kansas was to be a free or a slave State did not depend on the pro-slavery party in Missouri or its champions in Congress; but on the conscience of the whole country. Brown and his four brave sons knew all this part of Kansas--its trails, its strategic points, its river depths--as well as any Indian that had made his home centuries before Columbus saw the light in Genoa the Proud. Brown turned all his wisdom to good account. His was the free lance of New England love of liberty. Lawrence, now a thriving city--with its beautiful university looking down over it, full of the hum and stir of honest and pushing thrift; catching now its nerves of power from the current of the river, now carrying its wheels by steam; educating its boys and girls with utmost care; driving its trade westward and southward with a steady eye on the march and consolidation of population; rearing its beautiful churches with sublime faith in the Power which gave freedom to all the broad acres of the State; and treasuring the traditions of its heroic history with honest pride--is a miracle of love of liberty, tenderness toward the slave, and of far vision into the future. It is the only American Troy we have. Every one of its plains and copses sings an Illiad. The marks of the first balls in the struggle for the slave's rights can be seen in some walls and trees. A strange admiration of the vanished hands came over me as I walked the streets of this growing and historical place. It will hand down the name of Amos Lawrence and the Massachusetts and New England aid societies with a precision and power of high moral significance which Alexander could not give to the city of his name and fame. The streets you walk over are full of meaning. The first one I struck was Massachusetts street; and so it was to the end--New England names, New England faces, New England life. There is no place on the continent where Puritan ideas have projected themselves into the future with more definiteness than just here in Kansas. The air is that of Virginia; but the flow in the veins is that of the men who landed on Plymouth rock. There can be but one focus of thought in a nation at a time, and Kansas was that very thing all the way along from 1854 to 1858. It was the smelting-furnace of sentiment for four other years, 1861 to 1865. But all is now peaceful and plentiful in Kansas."

Facts from "A KANSAS SOUVENIR" by Hon. John J. Ingalls, 1896. Submitted by Lance Reppert, Lawrence, Ks.

The normal condition of the genuine Kansan is that of shy and sensitive diffidence. He suffers from excess of modesty. He blushes too easily. There is nothing he dislikes so much as to hear himself talk. He hides his light under a bushel. He keeps as near the tail end of the procession as possible. He never advertises. He bloweth not his own horn, and is indifferent to the band wagon.

He is oppressed by the vast responsibility of being an inhabitant of a commonwealth so immeasurably superior in all elements of present glory, in all the prophecies of future renown, to its inferior companions.
